research contributions by established and early-career researchers who have been significantly engaged in the Himalayan region. Grounded in a commitment to theoretically informed area studies, and covering Tibet (China), Assam (India), and Nepal, each case study is situated within contemporary debates in sociolinguistics, political science, and language policy and planning. Bridging disciplines and transcending nation-states, the volume offers a unique contribution to the study of language contact and its political implications. The Politics of Language Contact in the Himalaya is essential reading for researchers in the fields of language policy opportunities are not lucky because they do not take action. Others are exposed to a lot of opportunities, but they can't actually see the opportunity that is in front of them. Still another group of people do see the opportunity in front of them; they desperately would like to take action, but they are just not in a position in their life that allows them to grab it. Or at least that is what their mind is telling them. They feel they are lacking in the resources of, say, time or money to take action on opportunities. And then yet a whole other group of people does have the resources of time and money, but they refuse to act because of their fear. They are skeptical. It seems too

Mohammad Ali Jinnah and Mahatma Gandhi.
Jinnah shaped the final settlement by consistently demanding Pakistan, and Gandhi defined the largely non-violent nature of the campaign. Each made their contribution by taking over and refashioning a national political party, which they came to personify. Theirs would seem, therefore, to be a story of success, yet for each of them, the story ended in a kind of failure. How did two educated
